

"A CASE STUDY OF LOCAL COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT AND CITIZEN PARTICIPATION IN CUBA: A COMPREHENSIVE NEIGHBOURHOOD TRANSFORMA-APPROACH" International Journal of Cuban Studies 11.2 Winter 2019

<https://docslib.org/doc/2094800/a-case-study-of-local-community>

against:

<https://bonilla-santiago.camden.rutgers.edu/files/CLC-2018-Monograph1.pdf>

Anchor Institutions Advancing

Local and Global Sustainable

Community Development 2017-2018 Conference Proceedings

Rutgers University-Camden

economic crisis and special period of the nineties, the importance of this scenario has been rescaled, as a result of the limitations of basic resources to solve many economic and social problems and the increase in population and activities that take place during this time (Uriarte 2002). Consistent with this reality there are two important facts: the creation of People's Councils² (1988-91) local governing bodies that coordinates the community actions and structures, and the establishment of the Departmental Group for Cuban Community Work (1996), whose aim was to strengthen collaboration between community organisations and entities.

The leadership roles of the community organisations during the economic crisis of the 1990s have been highlighted by different authors. Uriarte (2002) campuses, among others emerged onto the community scene. It articulated to a lesser or greater extent the experiences with community development that existed previously.

previously.

Recently, the 'process of updating the Cuban economic model', has focused its interest on the local-community development level. The Guidelines for Economic and Social Policy of the Party and the Revolution approved in 2011 highlight the need to strengthen local participation of citizen engagement and management in the regions as a way to solve many of the country's problems and it ratifies the principle of equality as an essential pillar of the Cuban social model. The new policy approved in 2017 confirm these views: it proposes development policy decentralisation government processes for decision making, there are still tendencies that limit community/local development, among them: the disconnect between social and institutional programmes developed simultaneously in communities, poor coordination among stakeholders due to the prevalence of a sectorial focus, the persistence of a centralist and top-down culture, the limited systematisation and evaluation of community development experiences; in addition to the lack of focus on equity in local development agendas.

At the same time, Cuba possesses many strengths to boost community development, a very strong Cuban social project among them, equality and social justice; the social participation of its people; the human capital created throughout several the economic crisis triggered in the nineties, the importance of this scenario has been rescaled, as a result of the limitations to main resources when solving resources when solving problems and of the increase in population and activities that take place in that area; two important events took place that are consistent with this coordinate and integrate community actions and organizations, and the establishment of the Departmental Group for Cuban Community Work (1996), whose aim was to strengthen collaboration between community organizations and entities. From then until now university campuses, among others, which articulated to a lesser or greater extent the experiences with community development that existed previously. The most recent moment, which is referred to as the "process of updating the Cuban economic model," has focused its interest also on the local-community level. In the Guidelines for the Economic and Social Policy of the Party and the Revolution, sanctioned in 2011, the need to strengthen local participatory management in the territories stands out as a way to solve different problems in the country, and to ratify the principle of equity as an essential pillar of the Cuban social model; this implies that a focus on equity must be included in the resolution of tendencies that limit community development, including the disconnect between social and institutional programs developed simultaneously in communities, poor coordination among players due to the prevalence of a sectorial focus, the persistence of a centralist and top-down culture, the limited systematization and evaluation of community development experiences; in addition to the centralist and top-down culture, the limited systematization and evaluation of community development experiences; in addition to the lack of focus on equity in local development agendas. At the same time, Cuba possesses many strengths to boost community work: the basis of

At the same time, Exclude this Text any strengths to boost community development, a very strong Cuban social project among them, equality and social justice; the social participation of its people; the human capital created throughout several decades; the existing social capital in communities made up of social organizations, different institutions, local governments, municipal universities, local citizen participation and governance support; strong cultural identity and traditions in every neighbourhood; and the solidarity of the people as an ethical and practical the same time, Cuba possesses many strengths to boost community work: the basis of the Cuban social project--among them, equity and social justice; the social participation of the people; the human capital created throughout several decades; the existing social capital in communities made up of social organizations, different institutions, local governments, municipal universities, stopped at match 10/17; it's gloria's journal article against gloria's conference proceedings but still should be cited; and at least some of the stuff is by different authors like this last screens the right panel is by Maria del Carmen Zabala Arguelles

"HISPANIC WOMEN BREAKING NEW GROUND THROUGH LEADERSHIP" in LATINO STUDIES JOURNAL JANUARY 1999
a book chapter 2020 or (1999 1st edition) in "Latina Issues...", it's gloria's chapter under the same title "Hispanic Women Breaking New Ground through Leadership" <https://www.taylorfrancis.com/chapters/edit/10.4324/9781003059141-11/hispanic-women-breaking-new-ground-leadership-gloria-bonilla-santiago?context=ubx&refId=f2831ed1-4725-4cad-87d9-7b7e038ae5ce>

Bonilla-Santiago, G. (2020). Hispanic women breaking new ground through leadership. In Latina Issues (pp. 217-235). Routledge.
against:

<https://files.eric.ed.gov/fulltext/ED201882.pdf>

AUTHOR Arthur, Patricia, Ed., TITLE Resources in Vocational Education. Volume 1umberINSTITUTION OhioState_Univ:* ,ColUMbusNational Center for Research In:VocationalEducation
SPONS AGENCY Office ofHvocational and AdultEduc

Exclude this Text a to undertake business ownership and management. This training program sought to equip potential managers with information about the management skills needed for functioning competently in a business ownership, corporate management, or personal life management situation. Trainees learned functional skills in motivation and personal development, communications, essentials of management process, and financial management. With an 87 percent retention rate, the 43 trainees completing the program indicated that their needs were addressed; the concept they learned were participate in business ownership and management. Offered at no cost to participants,, the training program sought to equip potential managers with information and techniques in the fundamental management skills common to functioning com- petently in a business ownership, corporate management, or personal life management situation. Trainees learned functional skills in motivation and personal development, communications, essentials of management process, and financial management. Field study was in- corporated in

<https://files.eric.ed.gov/fulltext/ED194252.pdf>

TITLE Conference on the Educational and Occupational Needs of Hispanic Women, June 29-30, 1976, December 10-12, 1976. INSTITUTION National Inst. of Education (DREW), Washington

hispanic women's movement: Feminism and Organizing

Exclude this Text According to some Hispanic researchers, the origins of the Anglo feminist movement stem from within a society that has transmitted, through its many institutions, oppressive attitudes toward minorities. Since the male traditionally bears the brunt of this offense to his personal pride and dignity because of greater opportunities for social interaction, his home has become the target for his misguided value as a human being or reactionary macho.

feminist movement. They initiated a campaign to change the status of women and their presence increased their awareness of the shortcomings of Chicanas occupy within the United States feminist movement. Anglo woman found themselves in the same ironic contradiction as the Chicanas as they approached the Mexico City conference, having to leave behind racial prejudices in pursuit of true international sisterhood. The disagreement with this notion had to do with the fact that Anglo women patronize the black members of her movement, while neglecting other ethnic minority women such as Chicanas, Puerto Ricans, Asians, and American Indians. This serious neglect, according to the Hispanic women's movement, stemmed from a group of white feminist from the East coast perspective, where black women were in the majority and did have women's movement, stemmed from a group of white feminist from the East coast perspective, where black women were in the majority and did have greater visibility than other minority women. However, when minority women were included in feminist activities, commissions, clubs or organizations, it was decision poses is overwhelming. The origins of the Anglo Feminist Movement are within a society that has transmitted, through its many institutions, oppressive attitudes toward minorities. Since the male traditionally bears the brunt of this offense to his personal pride and dignity because of greater opportunities for social interaction, his home has become the target for his misguided value as a human being or reactionary macho. "How can we bring these women together"? 190 S The Anglo woman found herself in the same ironic contradiction as the Chicana as she approached the Mexico City Conference, having to leave behind racial prejudices in pursuit of true international sisterhood. Did she do this? Let us look at how she has managed to overcome the prejudice by patronizing the black members of her movement, while continuing to neglect ethnic minority women seriously, such as Chicanas, Puerto Ricans, Asians, and American Indians. This serious neglect by white feminists emanates from a lopsided East Coast feminist's emanates from a lopsided East Coast perspective where black women are in the majority and have greater visibility than other minority women. Black women must pay attention to this. In this case, they are not greater visibility than other minority women. However, when minority women were included in feminist activities, commissions, clubs or organizations, it was always under the title of committee or subcommittee on minority women and never as president or chairwoman. Before and after the Mexico conference, numerous other conferences and workshops were held throughout the nation to discuss the issues. Planning committees and program announcements showed that panels on minority women were subtopics and were under lengthy list of major topics discussed by Anglo women organizers. The continuous failure to address the women of color, issues from a social structure position has led Hispanic women generally face external and internal constraints to other organizational efforts due to their economic position. Most of the women have been and continue to be at the bottom of the ladder with regard to education, employment, income, adequate health care, political representation, and fair housing. Commission occurs because of race, sex, low socioeconomic religious groups. In the Chicana community, for examples, a few women excel in taking leadership. These women and others (Adelitas, Lucia Gonzales, de Parsons, Mujeres del Primer Congreso Mexicanista, Erma Tenayuca, Graciela Olivares, Polly Baca Barragan, Gloria Molina, Dolores Huerta, Dr. Alicia Cuaron, Dr. Antonia Pantoja, Dr. Helen Rodriguez and others), served as role models for Chicanas. Together they provided evidence for Hispanic women in positive self-assessment as a strong, capable, intelligent individuals who can and must play a viable role in defining and obtaining their liberation and that of their people.

<https://doi.org/10.4324/9780203760642>

CHICANA FEMINIST THOUGHT: THE BASIC HISTORICAL WRITINGS

Edited By Alma M. Garcia First Published

1997

developing as early as 1968, when Dr. Hector Garcia, the founder of the G.I. Forum, met with Polly Baca Barragan, (the first Hispanic women Senator from Denver) and Dr. Sylvia Gonzales, (one of the first Hispanic women advocates for Latina rights) to discuss the formation of a national Chicana organization. Polly Baca was charged with meeting with Washington Chicanas to test the waters for such an organization. In 1971, the first attempt to form a national organization for Hispanic women was initiated by Lupe Anguiano, a Chicana employed with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. A group of Polly Baca was charged with meeting with Washington Chicanas to test the waters for such an organization. In 1971, the first attempt to form a national organization for Hispanic women was initiated by Lupe Anguiano, a Chicana employed with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. A group of Puerto Rican women from New York were invited (Lourdes Miranda King).

It was not until 1971, that the Chicanas group held a national conference in Houston, Texas. Resolutions generated by the conference called for legal abortions, birth control and child-care centers. At the same time Puerto Rican women on the East Coast founded the National Conference of Puerto Rican Women under the leadership of such women as Carmen Delgado Votaw and Paquita Vivo. Other communities around the country began to organize. In Los Angeles, the Commission Femenil Mejicana and The Chicana Service Action Center were founded to respond to the needs of California Chicanas. In Miami Florida, the Cuban Women's Club advanced the cause of Cuban women

During the 1980's Hispanic women entered a new phase of organizational development. This decade began with the National Hispanic Feminist Conference. Hispanic women leaders gather after a decade of attempts of organizational failures, ideological disputes, political and ideological battles between when any minority woman is included in feminist activities, commissions, clubs, or organizations, it is always under the title of committee or subcommittee on minority women and never as president or chairwoman. Before and after the Mexico City Conference, numerous other conferences and workshops were held throughout the Nation to discuss the issues. Planning committees and program announcements showed that panels on minority women were subtopics and were under lengthy lists of major topics discussed by Anglo women dominant society. She is at "the bottom of the ladder" with regard to education, employment, income, adequate health care, political representation, and social freedom. Why? The reason for her plight is that she suffers from a compounded 121 l'6 triple oppression. She is sponsored by the Catholic Church. These women and others in the past (Adelitas, Lucia Gonzales de Parsons, mujeres del primer Congreso Mexicanista, Erma Tenayuca) serve as role models for Chicanas. Together they provide evidence for the Chicanas' positive self-assessment Mexicanista, Erma Tenayuca) serve as role models for Chicanas. Together they provide evidence for the Chicanas' positive self-assessment as a strong, capable, intelligent individual who can and must play a viable role in defining and obtaining her liberation and that of her people. Julia de Burgos, a Puertorriquidia writing in the 1930's, captured much of the spirit of Chicana feminism.

concurrently with the present phase of feminism. As early as 1968, Dr. Hector Garcia, the founder of the American G.I. Forum, met with Polly Baca Barragan and this author this author in Washington, D.C. to discuss the formation of a national Chicana organization. Polly was charged with meeting with Washington Chicanas to test the waters for such an organization. Leadership conflicts the idea from materializing. In 1971 the first attempt to form a national organization for Latinas was initiated by Lupe Anguiano, a Chicana employed with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. She joined Also in 1971 Chicanas held a national conference in Houston, Texas. Resolutions generated by the conference called for legal abortions, birth control, and 24 hour childcare centers. And in 1972 Puerto Rican women on the childcare centers. And in 1972 Puerto Rican women on the East Coast founded the National Conference of Puerto Rican Women under the leadership of such women as Carmen Delgado Votaw and Paquito Vivo. In communities country, Latina women were organizing. In Los Angeles the Comisión Femenil Mejicana and the Chicana Service Action Center were founded to respond to the needs of California, and especially Los Angeles. Finally in the mid- In the Spring of 1980 Latinas entered a new phase of development. This decade opened with the National Hispanic Feminist Conference [held in San Jose, California]. The importance of the Conference is immeasurable in leaders began to boycott the conference hotel because they were not included as keynote speakers. They sufficiently disrupted events and disoriented participants to handicap the unifying efforts of the meeting. Although the conference proceeded successfully, the several agendas and platforms about the inclusion of Gay rights, refugees issues, and antifeminist positions from the many long time Chicana activists sought to establish their historical position in the Chicana community.

Exclude this Text

As always the conference prevailed and Hispanic women decided to be inclusive of gay rights, condemn right wing governments, while displaying a sensitivity to the boycott by moving conference workshops from the hotel. This conference was very particular in the history of Hispanic women because of the persistence and eventual resolution of leadership struggles which have caused so much conflict in the past and to some extent continues to cripple the present.

Exclude this Text

During the late 1960's the Chicano and other Latino groups bible or organizing principle was Paulo Freire's Pedagogy of the Oppressed. Freire's book became the handbook for the Hispanic oppressed. Dr. Sylvia Gonzales tells us that the reason this movement faltered was because although they read Freire's work and instinctively identified with its message, they were unable to internalize his methodology because of the strength of the social norms to which they were bound. It was very difficult for the movement to release the image of the "oppressor" and assume autonomy and responsibility for their condition. According to some of these women leaders "we put too much understanding and survival of any Hispanic woman a contradiction was one of wanting a model or organizing that allow the women to become part of the system which for them was adopting the "oppressors model and in reality seeking the power of the "oppressor". The timing for the organization ideological formulation was one that provoked community and grass-roots competition, negative undermining and destructive disruptions. The gain any one a piece of the pie, but show us how to change it (Gonzales 1981:45-47). She adheres to the fact that the reason why the feminist movement and Hispanic women have not gotten together is because they are trapped by this model. Some Hispanic women leaders refer to the white women benefiting from Affirmative Action more than minorities. Some say that they are chastising them for taking a "piece of the pie". Some analysts suggest that have become victims of the mistaken notion that any improvements in the status of white women is a remarkable accomplishment for them, too. In essence, when one looks at the conditions of poverty in general, the condition of Hispanic women in poverty has vastly improved. For professional Hispanic women, there seems to be very little, if any, advancement in terms of gaining

Exclude this Text

Hispanic women in general have been excluded from the movements the Hispanic men initiated nor from the feminist movement. They have begun to move into their own organizations within a climate of declining resources, self righteous negativity, and antifeminist and minority agendas. In essence, Hispanic women leaders have paid their dues and that has kept them honest and forward. The leadership that they want to see is one of cooperation, community and there are more documents that match here disgruntled band of local Chicanas angry because they were not included as keynote speakers sufficiently disrupted events and disoriented participants to handicap the unifying efforts of the meeting. Yet, the conference proceeded successfully in spite of the decided upon. Latinas decided to support gay rights, condemn right-wing governments, and showed sensitivity to the boycott by moving conference workshops from the hotel. Typical of the conference was the nature of the struggles, particularly the leadership direction for the future. The leadership struggles that have caused us so much conflict in the past and continue to immobilize us in the present emanate from a lack of a lack of reflection on our goals. In the early and late sixties, the Chicano bible was Paulo Freire's Pedagogy of the Oppressed. Freire's book became the handbook for the Latino oppressed. Only recently the validity of Freire's successful literacy campaign in Nicaragua. So, although we read Freire's words and instinctively identified with its message, we were still unable to internalize his methodology because of the strength of the social norms in which we live. The kinds of leadership struggles which National Hispanic Feminist Conference are those resulting from a group that has adopted the oppressors model and in reality seeks the power of the oppressor. And too often, the ambiguous concepts of community and grassroots become the banner and rallying cry. The competition, the wrong, we should form coalitions with other groups of like mind. It is my suspicion that the feminist movement and the Latino movement have not gotten it together because we 253 are trapped by the model. In the women's movement, what started as grassroots consciousness-to form a critical consciousness of their circumstance. The poor also become the victims of the mistaken notion that any improvement in their status is a remarkable accomplishment. In a sense, when one looks at the poverty of their conditions, a move from Mexican, Central nor from the feminist movement. We are barely moving onto our own. And we are doing so within a climate of declining resources, self-righteous negativity, and anti-feminist and minority agendas. Perhaps we are entering the most critical period of our recent history. The forces of "Community development transformation of Cooper neighborhood: a Rutgers-Camden University and LEAP Academy school collaboration through sustainable development"COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

2020, VOL. 51, NO. 5, 457-477

<https://doi.org/10.1080/15575330.2020.1781222>

against:

<http://www.revflacso.uh.cu/index.php/EDS/article/download/480/575>

Cant find the actual file; LATER/MAYBE dig more on internet and ru library look for id 480/575

But looks problematic: as per turnitin matches the texts are not identical; it may be by gloria as well, but none cites, so would be self-plagiarizing

Since its inception in 1990, the CLC has been a catalyst in redefining University-Camden plays in collaborating with the local community. The campus has become an anchor to launch successful community development projects that contribute to neighborhood transformation. The Rutgers CLC's work has enhanced these institutional efforts to improve the economic, social, and cultural wellbeing of a now-vibrant Cooper Street Education Corridor. The CLC strengthened the collaborative ties with local residents and institutions and contributed to Rutgers-Camden's strategic vision of education, discovery, engagement, and the development of networks of intellectual capital that reach into the community and globally.

The successes and gains of the Rutgers-CLC in the last 25 years have helped solidify the neighborhood and university campus as anchors in transforming and galvanizing community development efforts. The impact of the work is evident in residents' improved quality of life and the promotion of solidarity and agency, which have allowed intellectual capital that reach into the community and globally.

The successes and gains of the Rutgers-CLC in the last 25 years have helped solidify the neighborhood and university campus as anchors in transforming and galvanizing community development efforts. The impact of the work is evident in residents' improved quality of life and the promotion of solidarity and agency, which have allowed

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT 459

people in Camden to live and work according to their own meaning and arrangements. The Camden community with whom we work has a clear sense of purpose and participation where residents own their personal situation and are rebuilding and inspiring people in Camden to live and work according to their own meaning and arrangements. The Camden community with whom we work has a clear sense of purpose and participation where residents own their personal situation and are rebuilding and inspiring others to pool knowledge, talents, aspirations, and political will toward the sustainable wellbeing of their community. Collectively, the Rutgers CLC has accomplished this by drawing on university-community assets, resources, and pathways.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT 459

The guiding theory of action has centered on the belief that improving outcomes for young people and families with limited resources and opportunities necessitates the transformation of schools into communities where all children can experience an excellent educational system. Children in these communities have caring adults in all areas of their lives, in safe places, with a healthy start and healthy development, and with opportunities to learn, grow, and prosper.

The Rutgers CLC's focus has been on communities that are in need or struggling to sustain themselves, whether they are located regionally or globally. The city (Camden)

(CLC) has been a catalyst in redefining the role Rutgers University-Camden plays in collaborating with the local community in Camden City, New Jersey. The campus has become an anchor to launch successful community development projects that contribute to neighborhood transformation. The Rutgers CLC's work has enhanced these institutional efforts to improve the economic, social, and cultural well-being of a now-vibrant Cooper Street Education Corridor. The CLC strengthened the collaborative ties with residents and institutions and has contributed to Rutgers-Camden's strategic vision of education, discovery, engagement and the development of networks of intellectual capital that reach into the

www.revflacso.uh.cu/index.php/EDS/article/download/480/575

ssed is how does a community development initiative create a school that changes the educational conditions and sustains and produces high achieving students in one educational corridor for 25 years? The successes and gains of the Rutgers-CLC work in the last 25 years have helped solidify the neighborhood and university campus as anchors in transforming and galvanizing community development efforts. The impact of the work is evident in residents improved quality of life and the promotion of solidarity and agency, which have allowed people in Camden to live and work according to their own meaning and arrangements. The Camden community with whom we work has a clear sense of purpose and participation where residents own their personal situation and are

www.revflacso.uh.cu/index.php/EDS/article/download/480/575

and arrangements. The Camden community with whom we work has a clear sense of purpose and participation where residents own their personal situation and are constantly working to rebuild and inspire others to pool their knowledge, talents, aspirations, and political will toward the sustainable well-being of their community. Collectively, the Rutgers CLC has accomplished this by drawing on university-community assets, resources and pathways. The guiding theory of action has centered on the belief that improving outcomes for young people and families with limited resources and opportunities necessitates the transformation of schools into entire communities where all children can experience an excellent educational system with caring adults in all

stopped at 7/68

<https://rucore.libraries.rutgers.edu/rutgers-lib/60706/PDF/1/play/>

Matt closter diss; also problematic: under supervision of gloria;

Exclude this Text

Using a case study methodology (Yin, 2003) and an Appreciative Inquiry framework (Flint, 2012), we examine the emergence, formation, implementation, and sustainability of the Rutgers-Camden Community Leadership Center (CLC) and LEAP Enterprise, designed by university faculty and leaders as a strategy to rebuild community and an educational college access pipeline in Camden, New Jersey. This research examines how a university-driven community development initiative created a school that changed the educational conditions, sustaining and producing high achieving students in one educational corridor for 25 years.

Exclude this Text

Committed university faculty, administrators, parents, and community leaders changed the trajectory and outcomes for children and families by building a new concept of the university-school partnership and influencing state legislation to create charter schools in New Jersey, which transformed education in Camden. LEAP (Leadership

CONTACT Gloria Bonilla-Santiago ✉ gloriab@camden.rutgers.edu

© 2020 Community Development Society

a bottom-up, grassroots, and community-engaged participatory process that transformed the neighborhood in Camden.

Exclude this Text

This study contributes to community development and university-school partnership literature by documenting multidisciplinary approaches of integrating community needs to create a college-access pipeline. It is a focused approach to documenting best practices and recommendations that provide a blueprint for pipeline development – demonstrating sustainability and effectiveness at preparing students for college and careers. The LEAP Academy case study offers an opportunity to introduce how university personnel built an education pipeline using schools as vehicles of community development. The university campus offers social and intellectual capital to strengthen a partnership through civic engagement and community development for college students and faculty, opportunities for faculty and staff research, and support for new innovations on teaching and learning. The focus is on drivers that build and sustain a partnership from initiation to ongoing implementations and sustainability.

Designed by Dr. Gloria Bonilla-Santiago, a Rutgers Board of Governors Distinguished Service Professor in Public Policy and Administration, the CLC and LEAP Academy University School Partnership is a comprehensive, birth-to-college pipeline model in which children start their education as early as six weeks and proceed through high school to college. The school has approximately 2,000 students in the pipeline and has graduated over 1,000 since its inaugural class of 2005, which is 100% of all students educated at LEAP. LEAP graduates have attended and graduated from partner institutions Rutgers University, Rowan University, and Camden County College, all of which have campuses and facilities along Cooper Street in Downtown Camden. Others attended and graduated from top institutions, including Princeton, Brown, University of Pennsylvania, Howard, University of Rochester, and Villanova. The Rutgers-Camden Community

Literature review

Exclude this Text

Urban universities struggle with providing students with an equitable and quality path to college or career, in which a concrete college access pipeline integrates students in the fabric of the university. They lack links with urban K-12 school systems and do not see the need to develop educational pipelines during this early stage. This case study epitomizes early, direct engagement of a university in developing a school pipeline while revitalizing a neighborhood and influencing policy in new school models that the literature has not fully addressed.

Urban universities struggle with providing students with an equitable and quality path to college or career, in which a concrete college access pipeline integrates students in the fabric of the university. They lack links with urban K-12 school systems and do not see the need to develop educational pipelines during this early stage. This case study epitomizes early, direct engagement of a university in developing a school pipeline while revitalizing a neighborhood and influencing policy in new school models that the literature has not fully addressed.

Urban universities struggle with providing students and families to and revitalize distressed neighborhoods. Using a comparative case study methodology (Lijphart, 1971) and an Appreciative Inquiry framework (Flint, 2012), I examine the emergence, formation, implementation, and sustainability of two university-school partnerships designed by university faculty and leaders as strategies to rebuild communities and build an 2 educational college access pipeline. Committed faculty, administrat rebuild communities and build an 2 educational college access pipeline. Committed faculty, administrators, parents, and community leaders changed the trajectory and outcomes for children and families by building a new concept of the university-school partnership and influencing state legislation to create new categories of public schools charter schools in New Jersey and innovative schools in Massachusetts which transformed education in their respective states and neighborhoods. I found -- formed from a top-down, presidentially led institutional initiative to transform the neighborhood. This study contributes to university-school partnership literature by documenting multidisciplinary approaches of integrating community needs to create a college-access pipeline the literature has not fully confirmed. This dissertation is not an impact study of the effectiveness of pipelines, and nor is it an economic analysis of how much a university-school partners

<https://rucore.libraries.rutgers.edu/rutgers-lib/60706/PDF/1/play/>

s it an economic analysis of how much a university-school partnership builds economic wealth and value in a neighborhood. It is a focused approach to documenting stages of development that provides a blueprint for pipeline development, demonstrating sustainability and effectiveness at preparing students for college and careers. The cases in this study offer an opportunity to introduce how university personnel built an education pipeline using schools as vehicles of community development. The university campus offers social and intellectual capital to strengthen a partnership through civic engagement and community development for college students and faculty, opportunities for faculty and staff research, and support for new innovations on universities continue to struggle with the challenge of preparing students to compete in the job market. Universities in urban cities continue to struggle with providing students with an equitable and quality path to college or career, in which a concrete college access pipeline integrates students in the fabric of the university. They lack links with urban K-12 school systems and do not see the need to develop educational pipelines during this early stage. The two cases epitomize early, direct engagement of a university in developing a school pipeline while revitalizing a neighborhood and influencing policy in new school models that the literature has not fully addressed.

View Full Source Text

Exclude this Text educational pipelines during this early stage. This case study epitomizes early, direct engagement of a university in developing a school pipeline while revitalizing a neighborhood and influencing policy in new school models that the literature has not fully addressed.

Charter schools create new educational conditions

Since the early 1990 s, schools have transformed structurally through large-scale policy reforms that altered abilities to serve students and families more creatively and effectively (Noguera, 2003). As many researchers suggest (Anyon, 1997; Kozol, 1991; Lieberman,

Charter schools create new educational conditions

Since the early 1990 s, schools have transformed structurally through large-scale policy reforms that altered abilities to serve students and families more creatively and effectively (Noguera, 2003). As many researchers suggest (Anyon, 1997; Kozol, 1991; Lieberman, 1995; Sarason, 1996), large-scale bureaucratic reforms in public school systems have not produced an equitable public education system. Systemic reforms in which change is dictated from above are unattainable because of social policies that perpetuate social and physical conditions of impoverished neighborhoods (Anyon, 1997). School impediments include low expectations for students, district bureaucracy and rigidity, and educator resignation (Anyon, 1997). During education reform attempts in the 1990 s, researchers recognized new models of schooling emerging. Lieberman argued, "Salvation for our schools will not come from without but from within" (Lieberman, 1995). Lieberman (1995) Archway Publishing.

Exclude this Text

goals by creating new structures and organizations. The goals are to decentralize administration to support democratic governance of schools, implement school-based decision-making, and manage resources (Anyon, 1997). School systems should depart from hierarchical models of government oversight toward market-like models, and develop flexible, diverse methods to deliver public education (Mintrom & Vergari, 1997). Community schools particularly demonstrate that a school functions as a core neighborhood institution with comprehensive services, galvanizing community institutions, and groups to solve problems schools and communities confront (Benson, Harkavy, & Puckett, 2007; Dryfoos, 1994).

The national charter school movement legitimized states to adopt new policies to create local urban schools to satisfy growing demand for poor parents and children for and there is at least one more student paper by RU student in turnitin system:

stopped at 14/62

ha Exclude this Text

Camden has had a troubling history, experiencing economic and social downward spirals between 1955 and the mid-1990 s with a deteriorated government capacity and decreased tax base, caused by deindustrialization and white flight to the suburbs (Gillette Jr, 2005; Seligsohn & Mazelis, 2014; Annie E. Casey Foundation, 2001). Camden has lost nearly 50,000 residents and tens of thousands of jobs (Seligsohn & Mazelis, 2014). As middle-class whites, industries, and jobs moved to surrounding suburbs, African-Americans, Latinos, and poor whites remained in a jobless, decaying city without an economic base, turning to public assistance and perpetuating a cycle of poverty (Bonilla-Santiago, 2014; CSUCL, 1995). The Camden City School District population dropped from 18,536 in 1998 to 7,941 in 2018, with detrimental effects for children.

During the 1990 s, as the Rutgers CLC was planning and designing the transformation of Cooper Street in Camden, similar efforts began to gain popularity in the country with urban K-12 school systems and do not see the need to develop educational pipelines during this early stage. The two cases epitomize early, direct engagement of a university in developing a school pipeline while revitalizing a neighborhood and influencing policy in new school models. These educational circumstances force many universities to make the problem of the American school system their highest institutional priority (Benson and Harkavy, 2000). Although many universities

[Quoted text hidden]

[Quoted text hidden]

View Full Source Text

fulfill a purposeful agenda to achieve social outcomes that create positive effects on people and their environments. 28 Charter and Innovation Schools Create New Educational Conditions Since the early 1990s, schools have transformed structurally through large-scale policy reforms that altered their abilities to serve students and families more creatively and effectively (Noguera, 2003). As many researchers suggest (Kozol, 1991; Lieberman, 1995; Sarason, 1996; Anyon, 1997), large-scale bureaucratic reforms in public school systems have not produced an equitable public education system. Systemic reforms in which change is dictated from above are unattainable because of myriad social policies that school models in the form of community (Dryfoos, 1994) and charter schools (Budde, 1988) demonstrate the power and capacity to achieve these same goals by creating new structures and organizations. These models goals are to decentralize administration to support democratic governance of schools, implement school-based decision-making, and manage resources (Anyon, 1997). School systems should depart from hierarchical models of government oversight toward market-like models, and develop flexible, diverse methods to deliver public education (Mintrom and Vergari, 1997). Community schools particularly provide a 29 model that reflects John Dewey's theory that a neighborhood school can function as reliance on local property taxes to pay for education leads to structural disparities. Camden has had a troubling history, experiencing economic and social downward spirals between 1953 and the mid-1990s, with a deteriorated government capacity and decreased tax base caused by deindustrialization and white flight to the suburbs (Gillette Jr, 2005; Seligsohn & Mazelis, 2014; Annie E. Casey Foundation, 2001). Camden has lost nearly 5,000 residents and tens of thousands of jobs (Seligsohn & Mazelis, 2014). As middle-class whites, industries, and jobs moved to surrounding suburbs, African Americans, Latinos, and poor whites remained in a jobless, decaying